With the ever-increasing number of prisoners, a growing number of prisoners are arrested in their homes and not at the jail where their crimes were committed. In such circumstances, the prisoner may be arrested at home and brought to the jail for booking and processing. This is sometimes referred to as "booking and snitching" or "booking and pay a fine." In such circumstances, the prisoner remains in the same jail cell for the entire time that he is booked and processed. Such time can exceed several hours depending on the number of officers processing the prisoner and the time it takes for the prisoner to be photographed, fingerprinted, have his palm print entered into the facility's fingerprint database, and identified. For example, a prisoner arrested in his home with a white powder on his person may be booked and processed in approximately twenty minutes. A prisoner arrested at his place of business may be booked and processed in approximately thirty minutes. Depending on the number of officers in the jail at the time, the time for booking and processing can be considerably longer. During the booking and processing of the prisoner, the prisoner can attempt to act so as to minimize his time in jail. For example, the prisoner may attempt to stall by denying the charges, denying the arrest, or simply asking to talk to a lawyer. The prisoner's reasons for acting so as to minimize his time in jail is twofold: first, the prisoner may feel that he will receive better treatment if he remains friendly creation of the international 'Donetsk People's Republic' in Moscow, it was again struggling to forge a distinct narrative, let alone a political regime, in its capital city.

This was underscored by the relative inactivity of rebel forces and so the debate began about whether the Ukrainian government's offer of a ceasefire was likely to work. Or whether the conflict would continue to bleed heavily until 2014. It was hard not to conclude, however, that the material conditions and psychological dynamics of the war were already quite different from the times of Yanukovich and the fall of the Soviet Union. Image copyright Getty Images Image caption Rohan Philbin is hoping to be part of a rock band called Goodbye Brazil From South America's "undiscovered" musical epicentre, Rohan Philbin is putting his name to a musical musical - and he's hoping to be on its first roll call. In Rio de Janeiro, there is a celebration taking place every year on the 29th of April. That's feast day of the city's patron saint, St Anthony, and these days Rio is teeming with people who are celebrating music of every kind. "The Brazilian music industry is somewhat undiscovered," says Mr Philbin. "There's a different ethos to Brazilian music." Mr Philbin is still in Brazil, and the festival he's working at is the Gotu Music Festival, which takes place in one of the oldest and most famous venues in the Brazilian capital - the Samba Club, which has been a jazz venue for more than 100 years. It's an incredible place to be at this moment of musical history. The schedule this year, with its in-the-round seating and broad stage, echoes
