Q: Data structures: an abstract class with a final method Data structures: an abstract class with a final method is usually used to describe the structure of binary trees or other trees data structure. One example is described in this website There is the following description of the tree data structure: An abstract class TreeNode, that has a final method getValue. This method returns the value of the node (an integer in our case) that corresponds to a given key. TreeNode implements Comparable, so a very handy method in the interpreter: public int compareTo(Object obj) that returns 0 if the argument is this object and a positive number if the object is greater than this one, else a negative number. (This is the standard API) What does it mean by "an abstract class with a final method"? A: final means that you can only ever have one instance of the class. abstract means that your class cannot be instantiated.

to retain a free country and maintain the greatness of our nation. Article II of the Constitution vested "the Executive Power of the United States" in the president, in which the powers of the federal government are divided among three branches: executive, legislative and judicial. The president has no powers of legislation. In foreign policy, the president has the power to make treaties, which are laws between two or more states, but the president can also use executive orders as a way to implement and enforce the laws passed by Congress. Powers of the Federal Government The powers of the federal government are divided among three branches: executive, legislative, and judicial. The powers of the federal government are few, mainly restricted to the creation and enforcement of law; other powers are reserved to the states and the people. For example, Congress may delegate the power of taxation to the federal government. Federal laws are enforced by the executive branch of the government. The president has the power to pardon individuals for federal crimes. Federal courts are administered by the judicial branch. They have the power to declare the results of federal elections and other national political elections, and to reverse the rulings of lower courts and of the president. States have limited power in the national government. Each state has the power to levy taxes and establish its own revenue system. States may also grant the federal government power to regulate interstate commerce, or restrict government
